

[nether]

/ fortnight # 7

Christine Herzer
Simona Terron
Jim Davis
Anirban Roy Choudhury
Nazir Ali
Kushal Poddar

Made of whole peanuts covered with milk chocolate inside a colorful sugar shell M&M's peanut chocolate made their debut in 1954

She was born in 1965

M&M's were originally brown but in 1960 new colors red green yellow were added to the mix and were later joined by orange

You were born in 1983

His parents grow peanuts on their farm in Gujarat

Parents are roses
Parents are nuts

Parents grow roses
Roses are nuts

Roses are peanuts
Peanuts are nuts

M&M's have their own website India is not among the countries on their map

I melted for you

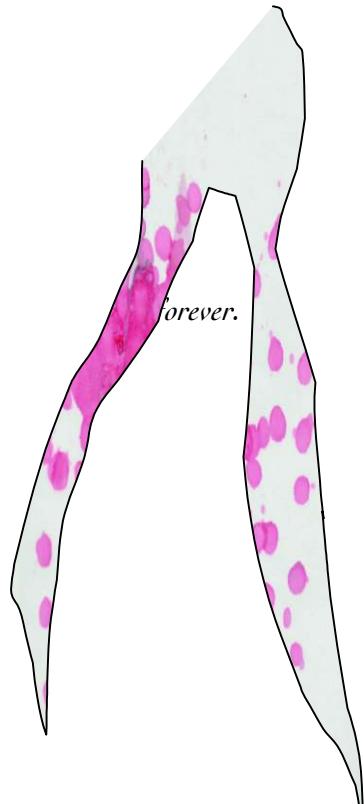

I melted for you

about the marks,

fingers wrapped around a man's right knee the woman has freckles high cheek bones and a dream he is holding a glass of champagne he has no face

I want to say to her:

Why don't you—Take off his belt Place it around your neck, I wouldn't worry about the marks, I am told true love lasts

Christine Herzer is a poet and visual artist. Her work appears in Fence, RealPoetik, American Letters & Commentary, Blackbox Manifold, BlazeVOX, elimae, nth position, Spiral Orb, Platform Magazine [India], Upstairs at Duroc [France], Fogged Clarity among others. An e chapbook is forthcoming with H_ngm_N Books. She received her M.F.A. from the Bennington Writing Seminars [Vermont, USA]. In 2011 she designed and led the 2week-Poetry-Workshop 'We die and become architecture' for the National Institute of Design [NID] in Ahmedabad, Gujarat.

Jim Davis / Three Poems

The Dripping Faucet

They said he was a good soldier, a constant in the boy scout reserves, strapping frasier firs to station wagon rooftops.
When he grew, the man at the newsstand said Boy, you know how to live!
Assuming he would snack on crackers and cheese that night. Most nights. There is a crippling efficiency in laundry and dishes and other such things.
In '84, Reagan threw fat fistfuls of funding at Walter Mondale, told him to screw himself.
Of course, there was more then than there is now.
And somehow the mystery brought everyone closer.
Alone on the beach, he jabs his cocktail umbrella into tiny ice cube islands, hoping they'll sink, melt, and make his drink more bearable.
He sees a woman tucking an auburn tress behind her ear, then she twirls gum and pops it with her mouth.
He is barebacked on the lawn, stirring slightly, hoping for the promised wind.
Damn you, Augustine, for questioning yourself.
Damn you, Springtime, and all your ruined cities.
Damn this heat and our patchwork lives.
The faucet dripping, the shrapnel of confetti from a ticker tape parade sticking to the sink.
Damn the whiskers on the canvas-come-basin.
Explain why we need so many soldiers, and how it ever seemed like a good idea.
From the tap, expanding beads, the fullest among them at the lip of the drain.

The Last Tasmanian

On the morning of the genocide, he carved kiwis in a field. The harbor and the ships painted gold by morning sun. The day clouded.
When evening fell, the torches lit faces like masks.
Fire touched the crying houses and farmers and farmer's sons.
When it ended, maps were rolled and stuffed in bags, chests filled and gathered. He was grateful.
He was alone. The boats pointed seaward.
As the night turned over, he sat on a log and split the brown whiskered flesh with a knife, sliced a section of emerald fruit, which drooled from itself, over his wrist, to the sand.
He placed the knife tip at his teeth and let the flesh slide between his lips. He pressed its sharp sweetness with his tongue, gathered its juice and swallowed, confident the final rowboat had set.
All things considered, he agrees about the suffering.
Now he does his best to keep branches off the siding of his home. He slips shears between thorny spirits of rose limb and snips. He pushes a cart through grocery aisles and brings sacks of fruit to his kitchen, where he carves kiwis on a board.
He chews sweet flesh with reverence.
From his kitchen window, a truck groans and pulls its cargo to the curb. A silver door rises and brown-slat fruit crates are wheeled from it.
The kitchen sways and tilts like a ship deck.
A farmer stares back at him, wheat grass between his teeth, a thumb stuck behind his overall strap, assures that this is fresh as fruit gets! He drops the blade to the floor, throws the bolt on the door.

When Parking is Tight

He watches from the window, the blinds have parted. I am squeezing myself forward, crank right, reverse, crank left, park between his car and another.
There is no room to pull out, but can you see how close I am to the door. He is watching me from an empty room, save a chair near the window.
Save the blanket on his lap. Save a ceramic figurine on a small table. Save him. Save 50%, says Mufflers 4 Less, stenciled on the side of a van.
In the morning I find the fat E has grounded the see-saw needle. The tank is stone dry.
And there's a small crack in the bumper.
He helps me mush to the pump. He's that kind of guy.
How did I ever fit in? There's barely a breath between.
He's the kind of guy who takes topless photos of himself after 30-40 pushups, a blink of light reflected in the mirror. He is the kind of guy who keeps an umbrella on him always.
He's the kind that bounces knuckles off the ceiling.
And she's the kind of girl who answers with heels on the hardwood. Who will sleep around and go hung-over to work. Who will spend an hour in a parked car with the kind of guy he is.

Jim Davis is a graduate of Knox College and now lives, writes and paints in Chicago. Jim edits the North Chicago Review, and will be appearing as the feature artist for the upcoming issue of Palooka Magazine. His work has appeared or is forthcoming in Poetry Quarterly, The Ante Review, Chiron Review, The Café Review, Red River Review, Midwest Literary Magazine, and Blue Mesa Review, among others.

Anirban RoyChoudhury / One Poem

Vendetta

The dusk carried a message today In guise of a verbal scrap Innocence's child and an uncharitable father Fire a row over some whelp's body.
"It's dead," said he, adjusting his heavy specs His son sassed up some naive quibble Curiosity declined descry, turned back the last time A forlorn verdict, "It's asleep".

Anirban is 19. He is an English literature student from Scottish Church College, Kolkata. This is his first publication. He writes because he wants people to listen.

Simona Terron / One Poem

Disengagement

A soft pop as I disengage my head From my heart from my groin
I hear you moan lightly in your sleep
A cross between a mumble and a sigh
And wonder at our respective states:
You, asleep, spent, resting your weary self
As I stare, awake, at the ceiling and wrestle mine
A dog barking somewhere far away in the night Distracts my snarling thoughts from turning on each other And instead I catch a glimpse of your face Completely relaxed, calm, it surprises even me My instinctive leaning over to kiss your forehead
And while doing so I inhale the scent of your hair.
This is all I have of you to call all mine
The image of a divinely supine you beneath my covers Your feet bathed in moonlight stealing through the window Of my 22nd floor 4-bedroom, luxury apartment.
And I ponder in panic at the thought Of your waking, brow creased in confusion
As you try, still sleep fogged, to decipher Why my side of the bed is empty And what my slippers, one carelessly turned over,
Are doing near the wide-open French windows.

Simona Terron, a journalist for the last ten years, occasionally writes poems when inspiration strikes. She loves cats and enjoys spending quiet time with them when she's not reading or cooking or working on a charity initiative called The Bicycle Project.

Nazir Ali / One Poem

Prayer for the Dead

The ten holy men, dressed in shades of white, divide the Holy Book
three chapters each,
and recite, swaying,
each one a pendulum of prayer.

No halo surrounds the heads of these holy men.
A few of them are coarse, earthy.
Then my eyes are drawn to the callused ankles, the tread-worn soles bent in prayers – athletes serving God.

Each busy in his own plot of divided holiness.
Yet their tributaries of chanting collect, gather force enough to make my scientist brother whisper,
See, the ring of flowers vibrate, our father's spirit is here.

M.Nazir Ali is an Associate Professor of English working in Tagore Arts College Puducherry, India. His poems have appeared in Indian Literature, Nthposition, Brown Critique, Asia Writes and Reading Hour. Kavya Bharati will feature his poems in the coming edition.

Kushal Poddar / One Poem

On a sublime note

The note,
a surprise element, meanders through the traffic stalled at the middle bridge.

We close our eyes standing still on the tip of a pyramid, our stretching indexes in touch with the finger we cannot see.

Kushal Poddar resides in Kolkata. Previously, he has been published in Bengali on several occasions and has written fiction and scripts for television mini-series as well. His English poetry has appeared in various print and online magazines. He is the author of "All our fictional dreams" and his poems have been published in the book "Poor Poet's Pantry: Collaborative Poems".